"Willie Takes A Wife"

I'd known Willie for a number of years. On my very first trip into the Southern mountains, I'd unpacked my samples on his porch and he'd selected a fine black-and-white checkered suit. As the years passed, I'd seen this same suit hanging in Willie's parlor, and although it was mended and patched it still served him as his going-to-town garb.

Willie needed a wife to take care of him. He needed someone even more to take care of his house which was rundown, dirty and cluttered. He knew this and he'd always mention that it would be pretty handy to have a woman around who could help with the farm-work and wood cutting too.

Each year I prodded Willie about doing something about his problem but despite his assurances that he would make his move soon, he was either too shy or too lazy to do so.

It was one evening when I was sitting in the lobby of the Skyline Hotel, a hundred miles from Willie's cabin, that an item in the local newspaper caught my eye. It was an advertisement a former hod inserted offering a home and security, comfort and companionship to anyone who would marry him. The next morning I colled the newspaper and found that there had been several responses to the ad and it was then that I decided that the next time

I was in Shootin' Creek, I'd run a similar ad in an effort to help out my friend.

A month later when I knocked on Willie's door, I placed his local paper in his hand and pointed to the ad. Willie's face was a blank. Then, suddenly remembering that he'd never gone beyond the first week in school, I took the paper from him and read the ad aloud. The mountaineer was first dismayed and then annoyed that I should have taken such an important step without consulting him. However, in a matter of minutes he was bubbling over with excitement. I had copied the former's ad word for word and found Willie completely enchanted by the phrasing. I had to read it to him again and again.

It was early evening when the first lady arrived. She thundered into the yard in an old model-T car, raising a cloud of dust out of which chickens ran, flew and crawled. We got a look at this girl through the window and she was no beauty. Her nose flopped from side to side and her bottom teeth and jaw extended like an open drawer. She pounded on the door for a half-hour while we held our breathless silence inside. Her pounding became more insistent as time passed and we were sure she was going to burst into the room at any moment. I'll never forget her voice.

"Darling," she screamed, "it's me — Hazell I've come to chase away your coars."

At the end of fifteen minutes her voice had deepened and taken on an edge of desperate huskiness.

"Lemme in, you no good ridge-rat. I know you're in thar. Ah can smell you!"

Hazel finally gave up in disgust and as her old car bounced out of the yard, the exhaust backfired repeatedly as though in angry derision.

She was but the first of many. A night of terror was to follow. There were times when Willie's property looked like a grove yard for abandoned automobiles. The girls clamored, giggled and roved. At one time, a whole section of the front porch fell in from the weight of the well-fed females. At last, in answer to Willie's pleading, I went outside and told the flock that they were all too late . . . that Willie had already made up his mind. I didn't explain that his decision was to remain a bachelor, forever.

It was the mail the following morning that brought the offer that was to change Willie's whole life. Lem, the carrier, handed the mountaineer a package containing perhaps a hundred letters. Many of them were addressed in crude pencil lettering while others were neatly written as though penmanship was one of the qualities Willie would consider decisive.

I read Willie many of the letters and most of them sounded as though they'd been written by members of the pack of females who'd provided the excitement the night before. But it was a blue envelope, scented with perfume, that attracted our attention. It contained an invitation to tea, and the return address was that of a big summer vacation house on Bald Eagle Mountain. Willie became quite excited.

"That's the rich city widow," he said. "She comes up here every summer and spends money like a skunk sprayin' a pack o' hound-dogs."

I sold Willie a new suit and a pair of shoes . . . the first he'd ever worn. I trimmed his hair and shaved his beard. At the appointed time we knocked on the door of the big field-stone mansion. The maid opened the door for us. She ushered us into the big living room and pushed chairs up to the great fireplace for us to sit on. Then she took our coats just as Mrs. Winters minced into the room.

Mrs. Winters was portly and she seemed to flow rather than walk as she came towards us. She smiled a great smile and her teeth reminded me vaguely of piano keys.

"So nice of you to come," she said, "Now which of you is the interested party?"

I pointed towards Willie who kept his eyes down on the rug as he flushed crimson.

"That's him," I said.

The great lady eyed him a bit suspiciously for an instant and then beamed a great smile.

"You're cute," she said. "We'll have some tea, then we'll have a nice talk."

Mrs. Winters rang a little bell that was on the table and the maid who'd returned to her chore of scrubbing the floor of an adjoining hall arose and came into the room. She was a lean mountain girl, capable looking but without much grace.

"You want me, Mor'm," she asked.

"Mondy, move the table over here near the fireplace and bring in some tea and cookies, please," Mrs. Winters ordered.

"Yes, Mar'm," Mondy replied.

She picked up the heavy coffee table easily and carried it to its proper place, then departed for the kitchen. A few minutes later she returned with a tray of tea things.

Mrs. Winters chatted gaily as we sipped our tea. I had to caution Willie against eating the tea bags, a habit I found he'd had for a long time.

After tea, Mrs. Winters sat on the divan beside Willie and poked her head on his shoulder. Willie had a faraway look in his eye . . . as though he'd found joy at last.

Mondy removed the tea things and about that time I decided I could serve Willie no more. I excused myself and said goodbye as my business required me to be in the next town on the following day.

I didn't see Willie again until my annual visit the following spring.

As I pulled up the dirt road to his shack, I wondered if he'd married or was still the mountain hermit of old. One glance at his house told me there had been a change of some kind. It was pointed and the yard that had been a clutter of old automobile tires and worm-infested boards was neat and orderly.

Willie walked out on the porch as he heard my engine stop.

"Well," I greeted him . . . "You did it — you got married!"

"Yep," he said . . . "Ah shore did . . . ta th' woman yo' met up thar on Bald Eagle Mountain . . ."

I was surprised! "But she was rich . . . how come you're still living here?" I asked. "Why not in her big house?"

"She wasn't so rich," Willie said . . . "in fact she was poor!"

At that moment, Mandy, the maid, walked out on the porch and began to sweep.

"Your wife?" I asked.

"That's her!" Willie replied.
